The width of the paper is sixty-two inches, and instead of being cut into sheets as it passes from the machine, is rolled upon large rollers and cut into the desired sizes afterward.

The Company are building several very handsome little cottage houses for the accommodation of their operatives, and when their Mill is completed and the grounds about it are appropriately laid out, the place will be a beautiful one, and creditable alike to the taste and enterprise of its owners. We shall have more to say of this Mill when it is completed.

The principle is in fact that of mutual insurance, in the only practical and efficient form—the large capital binding all interests together in providing ready cash means.

Already has the fined accumulated to upwards of $250,000, and will soon reach the sum at which it is to be stationary, as all in excess is to be applied to the redemption of the scrip which bears the annual interest of 6 per cent.

This Company is truly a model Company for Fire and Insurance, both as to the principles on which it is formed and the skill and ability with which it is managed.

The True — A race for a purse of $25 comes

On the next Wednesday at noon 1 was once again, and at once took my way down to the Grange. Mrs. Markham had been very ill, I heard, and was now no better, the squire was even then at her bedside. I sent for him upon the place of very urgent business, and he came down into the library at once. If I had not been in his own house, and expecting to meet no ther but himself, I should not have known him. His eyes were swollen and dull, his gait tottering, and his features white and drawn like the face of a dead man. She had told him all, at last; his first and only love, his true, devoted with which it is managed.

speak further, when the front door-bell rang gently.

"The man has come," grouned the poor squire, as if inexorable fate had laid its very hand upon his shoulder.

"Show him in," said I to the servant, for his master seemed to have lost all power of speech.
For my part, I drew a hopeful augury from that delicate bell ringing; a ruffian that had nothing to fear would have pulled with both h s

"O, she told, did she!" said the villain, with a diabolic smile. "It will be the worse for her, presently, that's all."

"No, sir, she did not, if you mean your wife, Mrs. Heathcote. Ay, sir," added I, as he start-ed back, "we are aware of all that and very much more. You were prechead in the sir. much more. You were overheard in the gar-den. There is more than one thing known. witnessed, Henry Heathcote, of your old doings, that gentleman there pleases."

"That gentleman," said I, as I observed Mr.
Markham was about to speak, " is not to be intimidated, month after month, as Mrs. Heathtimidated, month fifter month, as Mrs. Heathcote was, into supplying your bottomless purse.
Nay, sir, your oath is not to be trusted. I hold in my hand a warrant for your apprehension, procured yesterday from Hampshire by Mr.
Raby, upon a charge of forgery, the proof of which I have now with me. The consequences are upon your own head, remember, and when you leave this house, it will be for a fast!"

'I was quite prepared for this, sir," said the ruffian, with a look of indescribable malice -- "Mrs Markham that was, will, however, ac company me to prison. Fine food for the scan-dat of the county that will be; and a good convict's wife she will make to me in my banishment without doubt."

Mr. Markham writhed like one in torture up on his chair. We were indeed in the man's power as he said, and my journey into Hamp-shire had been of but small service. One desperate course, however, which had been suggested by Mr. Raby, was left to me, and I tried it. "Miserable man," said I sternly, "do you dare to force us to extremities! You scoff at banishment, but what say you to the gallows! you"—I strode to the trembling gallows: you —I strode to the trembling wretch, and laying my hand upon his shoulder, whispered aloud—' 'you murderer!''

The sweat stood out upon his pallid brow, his knees knocked together, and his hair seemed absolutely to bristle up, so abject was his terror. "Mercy! mercy! I never found the notes," he

"No," said I; " but here is the packet"— and I produced it—" and red with the blood that still cries out against you!" At the sight of this frightful evidence, the coward knell hands.

"Rise, wretch—go!" thundered the squire, who had risen up like a man returned to life from the grave. "Here is money—the sum that you required—take it. If ever again these which he will make aponished most approved myle.

eyes of mine light on you, as sure as there is a sun in heaven, I hang you."

The cast-down, half paralyzed figure of Mr. Markham seemed to dilate as he said these words; he looked like some incarnate Nemesis denouncing certain vengeance upon the creahouse, as though the executioner was even then upon his licels, sped away under the flaming eye of noon from Woodislee, for ever.
